Of all the Indian battles recorded in United States history, none is more fascinating or gruesome than the tale of General Custer's great battle on the Little Big Horn Plate. From the thousands of American troops who went into action against Sitting Bull and his horde of red minions, not one escaped alive, every American soldier meeting death at the hands of the redskins, and General Custer being killed by the then famous chief, Rain in the Face, but not scalped, because of the Indians' respect for his great bravery. The picture production of this great battle, which is being run at the Comique to-day, is a Selig offering and was made on the famous battle-ground, with real Indians being used in the posing of the battle scenes. The picture marks the making of the most stupendous spectacular battle picture ever produced.

A horse attached to one of H. J. Smith's meat carts did a little stunt in the runaway line Saturday evening. The driver left the horse standing on Granite street and the animal, evidently tired of one position, took a brisk gallop for home. As the outfit turned the Granite street corner onto North Main street, the cart tipped over and skidded along on its side to Seminary street, where the runaway was stopped. The Bijou theatre management's idea of giving somebody in Thursday, Friday or Saturday audiences a five-dollar gold piece took well with the public, as was evidenced by the large crowds.
